Felix Castro didn’t remember inviting a full-sized Chevy Silverado into his home in the middle of the night. Nevertheless, one literally dropped onto his family room sofa.

“There was smell of smoke and exhaust fumes,” he said. “I just remember being worried that the truck might have hit a main gas line and cause the house to catch on fire or even explode.”

A neighbor overheard the collision and recommended Construction First. “She told me they were doing some work for her and that I should check them out,” Castro said. “Construction First came the next morning.”

“They were fast and efficient,” he said. “Within minutes they had people boarding up the house and everything.”

The truck crashed through several rooms, hitting and damaging main structure beams. But Construction First was on the job. “I was pretty impressed with the work,” Castro said. “I expected them just to put up the walls, but they had engineers inspect the structure and everything.”

But putting up new walls isn’t the only part of reconstruction, making the new blend with the old is what Construction First considers an art. “They repainted the whole house. Had it been up to the insurance, they would have just painted the new walls, but it would not have matched.” Castro said “Construction First took the time and made it all blend. They were people-oriented.”

“They didn’t do the job just to get it done, they really listened and were concerned about my needs. That was the difference.”

“Now my home is back to its original design and remains comfortable.

Castro said. “I’ve had no issues after the construction.”

“It was quality work.”
